CURRENT CATALOG DESCRIPTION:

This course examines how the process of economic development is governed on the national, transnational and international levels. Theories of political modernization, imperialism and dependency, the developmental state, neoliberalism and post-developmentalism will be used as alternative approaches in the study of several policy areas, such as international trade, technology and intellectual property, social welfare and natural resources.

PROPOSED CATALOG DESCRIPTION (no longer than 75 words): leave blank if no changes are being proposed to the catalog description. NOTE: information about prerequisites should NOT appear in the catalog description.)

This course examines the interaction of politics (the making and implementation of collective decisions for a society) and human development (the improvement of living conditions in a society). Various theoretical approaches are used to study the role of politics in the multiple dimensions of development, including economic growth, environmental sustainability and human rights.

RATIONALE FOR CHANGE:

The change in the recommended course preparation is expected to make access to the course less restrictive while guaranteeing that students arrive at the course with the necessary background knowledge. There are social sciences and humanities courses other than GLBL 101, GLBL 301, POLI 260 and POLI 280 that can provide students with the necessary preparation for POLI/GLBL 386. GLBL and POLI majors with junior standing are very likely to have a combination of previous coursework that enables them to take POLI/GLBL 386.

The proposed course description contains a clearer definition of the politics of development as a field of study. In comparison to the current description, it is more focused on the presentation of the object of study of the course than on specific theories that an instructor might teach during the course.
