PROPOSED CATALOG DESCRIPTION (Approximately 75 words in length. Please use full sentences.):

This course will provide an in-depth discussion of the major issues in the field of health promotion and disease prevention through the lens of Behavioral Medicine. The course will include (a) introduction to major causes of premature illness, disease and death by age, sex, and race/ethnicity/socioeconomic status, (b) discussion of socio-cultural, psychological, biobehavioral and environmental contributions to disease, and (c) strategies for risk reduction through evidence-based programs for health behavior change. This Health Psychology course will encourage discussion of relevant economic, public policy, and ethical issues as it relates to the integration of mental and physical health.

RATIONALE FOR NEW COURSE:

This course was offered as Advanced Topics PSYC 493, and has been taught three times by this faculty. It was offered as an upper-level course without the WI designation. It will ultimately be submitted for a 'writing intensive' designation after regular course approval, with attention to WI criteria prior to that special submission.

The required preparation for this course includes PSYC 385, since this class builds on PSYC 385 Health Psychology content adding a more in-depth discussion and analyses. This course builds on the major's and minor's Applied Domain Health Psychology focus and brings it to a capstone level course for more analyses. This course will serve all majors in psychology, counts towards the major and minor in psychology and will be offered either in spring or fall. All students seeking a Psychology major or minor will need to have this course graded. P/F option is open to Psychology major and minor students already having acquired their 400-level course credit in Psychology or for other majors interested in an upper-level course in psychology.
